

What the Elections Mean to Conservatives

By Representative Newt Gingrich

Dr. Edwin J. Feulner, Jr, President of The Heritage Foundation: Ladies and gentlemen, members of the Heritage Foundation's President's Club, on behalf of all of us, thanks very much for making the special effort to be here with us today for the largest meeting ever of our President's Club. It's an exciting time to be a conservative here in Washington, and at this time it's my very great pleasure to introduce you to the Vice Chairman of our Board of Trustees.

The victories that we're celebrating today didn't begin last Tuesday. They started more than 20 years ago when Dick Scaife had the vision to see the need for a conservative intellectual movement in America. Through his foundations, he has supported think tanks, scholars, magazines, and institutes all over America. These organizations built the intellectual case that was necessary before political leaders like Newt Gingrich could translate their ideas into practical political alternatives.

We're all extremely proud at the Heritage Foundation that Richard Scaife is the Vice Chairman of our Board. Dick, will you introduce our speaker, please?

Mr. Richard M. Scaife: Whether we like it or not, our speaker this afternoon is not just a symbol; he is a signal. He is a signal that with political victory, the ideological conflicts that have swirled about this nation for half a century now show clear signs of breaking into naked ideological warfare in which the very foundations of our republic are threatened and that we had better take heed.

He is a signal to us here that we had better know what we are about and that we who are so gathered must find the will and courage to stand fast and work together to revitalize individual freedom so that government can be returned to the people.

Finally, he is a signal to all Americans that our political system can and will work if we clearly understand what must be done these next two years—and that's just for openers.

You all know him: an Army brat of my native Pennsylvania who has found a professional lifetime of happiness as the supercharged Congressman from Georgia; a whip with hooks in his tail; a reform-minded champion of the underdog, whether a disadvantaged preschooler or a blue collar guy trying to make it someplace; a streetwise intellectual; an historian; and a great patriot.

We can all expect the political war to intensify, so I ask you, Congressman Gingrich, what now? Indeed, if the war is intensified, let the contest begin here and now with you, sir.

Congressman Gingrich: Well, as I was saying to this group about six months ago in May, more can happen than you might think. Let me say first of all that I am especially glad to be up here, flanked by two of the people who have really created modern conservatism. Dick Scaife is a remarkable citizen who has spent many years as a key force in sustaining conservative ideas and who has played a major role on the Heritage Foundation's Board. He's been a good friend and ally for a very long time.

Congressman Gingrich is the Speaker-designate of the U.S. House of Representatives.

He addressed a meeting of The Heritage Foundation's President's Club in Washington, D.C., on November 15, 1994.

And Ed Feulner, of course, has had the creative leadership to develop what I think is without question the most wide-reaching conservative organization in the country in the war of ideas and one which has had a tremendous impact not just on Washington, but literally across the planet. So to be speaking to you with these two gentlemen on each side of me is a great honor.

I'm going to talk about where we are and where we are going, but I think it's important to start with where we are and to recognize that the conflict of ideas we're in the middle of isn't just political. One of my favorite recent examples of what it's like to be a conservative in this city occurred on Friday, when I went to make a speech at the Willard Hotel for the Washington Research Group. This was only three days after we had won a majority, and it was my first speech in public about what we were going to do next.

So I went out and I got in a car which the Washington Research Group had sent to pick me up. It turned out to be a black Cadillac. I didn't think about it because it wasn't my car and I wasn't worried about it. I arrived down there and got out of the car and the press was all around me.

The following morning in the New York Times, in an effort to prove, I think, in the reporter's mind the inevitable selling out of populism by those who get power, they said, "Having given up his battered Honda Accord, Congressman Gingrich stepped out of his brand new Cadillac Brougham." Now there were two things wrong with the sentence. First, I don't own a Honda Accord. I own a 1967 Ford Mustang. And second, I don't have a Cadillac. But nobody in the reporter corps thought to check with my office before they wrote down their interpretation of what they assumed had to be conservative populist hypocrisy, which is what they're looking for.

That was then picked up by Newsweek, which had a reference in their "Conventional Wisdom" section about Gingrich having traded in his Honda Accord for his brand new Cadillac, which they hoped was large enough for my ego to not overflow it.

Now, I cite this not to pick a fight with the Washington press corps, but to simply say that when the Washington press corps wonders occasionally why those of us who are conservative get a little tired of the degree of bias and slanting, here is an exact, explicit, trivial, factual example of the constant, unending barrage of distortion. And we have to all understand that, whether it's on the university campuses where the tenured bastions of the left continue to preach, or in the news media, or in the bureaucracy, or in the Trial Lawyers Association (which is holding a wake this week), this election has been one battle in a long campaign. And that just as the great victory of 1980 did not in fact defeat the left, but simply dealt them a reeling blow from which they gradually recovered, having won a stunning victory this last week does not, by itself, get the job done.

Now I want to talk about what happened last Tuesday, about the short run and about the long run. First of all, last Tuesday the nation voted, woke up the following day, and was delighted with what happened. I think that's the biggest surprise to me, frankly. It's not the size of our margin. I always said we could be somewhere between plus 20 or 25 and plus 70 and that nowhere in between would shock me.

What did surprise me, and what we were totally unready for, was the way in which the Clinton Administration's decision to engage us directly guaranteed that the election would have consequences on a scale, psychologically, that I frankly was not prepared for and that I really experienced for the first time at the Willard, where I saw more reporters and more cameras than I'd ever seen anywhere outside of the closing weeks of a presidential campaign. It was astonishing.

And this is not about Gingrich. I believe deeply in the advice that General Fox Connor gave to Dwight Eisenhower: that you should always take your job seriously and never yourself. This is not about me. But it is about the notion that the country has voted decisively at every level, from state legislator to county commissioner to governor to the House to the Senate. There was a Republican tide in every part of the country, from Olympia Snowe's smashing victory in Maine to Pete Wilson's smashing victory in California, literally from coast to coast. You have in Georgia, for the first time in history, seven Republicans and four Democrats in the House delegation. We picked up five statewide seats. We have a majority on the Public Service Commission. And then you switch all the way across the country and you find in Washington State that we went from one Republican and eight Democrats to seven Republicans and two Democrats.

The astonishing result of the election is shown in the Wall Street Journal poll last Friday, the following numbers, which I just want to show you because I found them so startling. "Who should take the lead in setting U.S. policy?" Congress, 55; Clinton, 30. Now I don't have the exact number—Ed may remember it—but the number in terms of Congress the last week in October was something like 17 approve, 80 disapprove. I mean this was an institution which had the lowest level of approval, lower than it had during Abscam. And in two weeks, because of the election result, the American people woke up and said, "Oh, it wasn't the Congress, Stupid. It was the liberal Democrats."

Bob Dole and I met yesterday afternoon, and we were talking about the fact that we carry a much larger burden than we would have expected because of the country's decision that it in fact wanted a new leadership team now and that it wanted the President to compromise with the Congress. It did not want the Congress to compromise with the President.

Now, in case you wonder what that means, the Wall Street Journal poll last Friday said, "What should Clinton do?" One, "Compromise and revise his agenda," 67 percent; two, "Follow through on his original promises," 28 percent.

Fairly clear. A couple of others that are amazing: "How do you feel about a Republican majority in both houses of Congress?" 65 percent positive, 29 percent negative. That means a third of the Democrats feel good about having the Republicans in charge. "How do you feel about more conservatives being elected to the Congress?" 64 positive, 27 negative. "How do you feel about the fact that fewer people were elected who support Clinton's legislative agenda?" 54 positive, 38 negative. "Who has the better approach?" The choices here are Clinton or Hill Republicans. On crime: Clinton, 18; Hill Republicans, 38. On health care: Clinton, 36; Hill Republicans, 39. On jobs and the economy: Clinton, 30; Hill Republicans, 44. On the deficit: Clinton 23; Hill Republicans, 46. On Social Security: Clinton, 29; Hill Republicans, 42. On foreign affairs: Clinton, 36; Hill Republicans, 37. On welfare reform: Clinton, 26; Hill Republicans, 48.

It is the most astonishing affirmation of the desire for a fresh, bold, decisive change in this city that I have seen. It was captured by Charles Krauthammer's brilliant column (I believe it was on Thursday) where he said this is the most ideological campaign in modern times, that the Republicans said what they would do, the Democrats attacked them for what they said, the President campaigned against it, we campaigned for it, the country voted, and the Democrats lost.

And I must say to his credit that Senator Moynihan, on the Brinkley show on Sunday, had a copy of the Contract With America, which I'm told now will be out in book form in December—and Senator Moynihan said, frankly, a lot of it is pretty good and he's going to help pass a good bit of it. I thought that was very, very positive, very supportive.

Connie Mack, Senator from Florida, called me on Thursday. Marianne, my wife, and I were driving up with my daughter Jackie, and we were going to drop her off in Greensboro to visit her sister. We were listening to Rush, and Rush was reading the letter we had sent Congressman Foley, and my daughter, who works for a cellular telephone company, suggested that I call Rush. So I did while we were driving in South Carolina, and I called and got on the show and chatted for a couple of minutes and then found out later that both Bob and Corrine Michel, who were driving in from Illinois, were listening to the same show and that Connie and Priscilla Mack, who were driving to Vermont to take a break, were listening. And so Connie called me, and he had two pieces of advice for me. He said, "Be bold and be decisive."

We're going to do everything that was in the Contract. Remember, our commitment is to get a vote on it. We can't guarantee we'll pass it. We're going to need your help and your effort. We're probably going to vote on the balanced budget amendment on January the 19th and go all-out from now to then to have that be our first big smashing victory, but we're going to need lots and lots of grass-roots help. The country has sent the message they want change, and we're going to give every member of the House a number of occasions to vote on whether he or she wants to vote with the country or to stand defiantly and say, "No, we don't believe you're serious."

So you'll see every single thing in the Contract voted on. We're going to have, I think, a very, very middle-class, working American, populist kick-off on the 3rd and 4th of January. We really want to recommit the Congress and the House of Representatives to truly being the people's house, and you'll see us announce a number of things. Congressman Jim Nussle is doing a great job as leader of the transition team and Congressman Dick Armey, who'll be the majority leader, is doing a great job. Congressman John Kasich is already working with The Heritage Foundation and others on developing new ideas and new approaches to move to a balanced budget. It's a huge challenge.

What I'd like to do, though, for a couple of minutes is focus on putting this immediate short-term challenge in strategic context. I want to make the case that there are two critical paths to whether or not we're going to succeed.

First, we have to win the definitional argument about how America works. I won't talk about that at length here today, but that's the centerpiece, this fancy language; that's the sine qua non, that without which nothing else can happen, because as long as the left can define America in their terms, we can't win. So it's very important to understand that the central challenge for the next six months is to accelerate our campaign to win the intellectual fight over how you define a successful country and what the wellsprings of American behavior are.

The second thing we have to do—and I'm going to shock some of my friends—is we have to engage in a deep, thorough dialogue with the American people on how to shrink the federal government to achieve a balance. We cannot replace the social engineering by the left with a social engineering of the right.

We cannot have only 435 House members, a hundred Senators, and a President decide in Washington on a trillion, 500 billion dollars a year, a huge quantity of money: over eight trillion dollars over a five-year budget. That can't be decided and redesigned and reinvented by the elected officials and their staffs. So we're going to have to have Heritage's help and help from everybody else who wants to help us engage and design a dialogue that is a sincere and a serious outreach to the entire nation and that gives the nation a chance.

But I want to make clear the sequence here. I have no interest in engaging in a debate with those who would raise taxes. That issue is over; it's gone; we're not going to do it.

On Friday, I used the phrase, "Cooperation, yes; compromise, no." And a number of people said, "But how can you talk about governing if you're not going to compromise?" The point is this: This country has been voting since 1968 against the Great Society. The track record is unending. The only two Democrats to win since 1968 both ran as New Democrats. Jimmy Carter was an outside reformer who was not a liberal and proud of it. Bill Clinton ran as a New Democrat who favored middle-class tax cuts, reinventing government, welfare reform.

Look at the track record. In 1967, Lyndon Johnson's Great Society and the counterculture's values began the destruction of the Democratic Party and the destruction of the poor. It has been getting steadily worse since 1967. The country has voted over and over to change it. As recently as 1992, a majority of the country voted for Bush and Perot, both of them committed to being against the welfare state. The facts are clear.

Once you accept the premise we're going to go in this direction—we're going to replace the welfare state, we're going to reassert American civilization, we're going to develop the opportunity society, we're going to move into the information age, we're going to compete in the world market, and we're going to reassert civic responsibility—then anybody who's willing to work within that framework is someone we want to have a total dialogue with, and we want to accept good ideas from everybody who agrees on the general direction. But we don't particularly want to have a single ounce of compromise with those who still believe that they can somehow improve and prop up and make work a bureaucratic welfare state and a counterculture set of values which are literally killing the poor.

Now to prove that I really am a professor, I want to walk through very quickly a set of ideas I developed originally as a synopsis for a Cobb County Chamber of Commerce training program for leadership. I want to walk you through a couple of big ideas because this will give you a sense of where I believe we have to go in the next two years.

I think that Drucker's The Effective Executive is the best single book on citizenship for the 21st century. Drucker is a remarkable student of management, and every citizen in the information age is in fact an executive. And I believe that the new edition of Alvin Toffler's Creating a New Civilization: The Politics of the Third Wave, which was produced by the Progress and Freedom Foundation, gives you a sense of the direction we have to move in in terms of the information age.

I believe that to solve problems—this is a model I use very explicitly and will use in the Speaker's Office—there is a four-layer hierarchy of vision, strategies, projects, and tactics. This is part of what confuses the Washington news media and the Washington establishment.

We have a very clear general vision, which I'm going to give you in just a minute. We're trying to design a series of strategies within that vision. Projects are the building blocks of a strategy, and a project, in my mind, because it's an entrepreneurial model, is a definable, delegateable achievement. It's getting something done. And finally, you have to have tactics that fit where you're going. For example, we've already decided there will be a very low-cost dinner on the night of January 3rd, open to any middle-class working American who can get here, so that everybody can participate in taking their Congress back because that sets the right signal, tactically, for who's involved—which is everybody. Now, that's what I mean.

The model of the left has been fairly clear: that redistributionism works, take from those who are successful, give to those who aren't. The counterculture's values don't require a work ethic, don't require savings, don't require studying. (After all, those are judgmental.) Bureaucracies are smarter than citizens; that's why we hire your cousin to tell you what to do with your money. I mean, it is a coherent model. You may disagree with it, but it's at least a rational model, and it's a pretty good predictor of how they behave. They never campaign on it because they'd get killed, but that is in fact an accurate description of what they will do.

Well, we're trying to communicate to the press corps, "Don't expect us to be a cheaper version of them. Don't expect us to spend much of our time being negative about them." We are building and communicating a new, positive vision of renewing American civilization, and we're communicating a new set of positive strategies.

First of all, I want to talk for a second about renewing American civilization. I do not believe we are faced with a political problem. I believe we are faced with a crisis of our civilization. I got into huge trouble the last weekend of the campaign over having commented on the terrible tragedy of a mother killing her two children in South Carolina. In fact, I have, all year, taken whatever the most recent tragedy was in whatever town I was campaigning in and tied it together with the following paragraph, which I will defend anywhere in America as a history teacher: It is impossible to maintain civilization with 12-year-olds having babies, with 15-year-olds killing each other, with 17-year-olds dying of AIDS, and with 18-year-olds getting diplomas they can't even read.

I believe that even in the most utopian society, it is the nature of humans that tragedies will occur. But these are not just isolated tragedies. We have tolerated the rise of a decadent society in which brutality and barbarism are accepted on a scale that is not imaginable to any decent person, and this is a crisis across the entire civilization. Things happen in your national capital which should not be tolerated.

Now, I use English quite deliberately: "not tolerated." That means we should take the steps necessary to stop them: not just complain about them, not just gripe about them, but stop them. I tell people that part of the key to American civilization is it's a very muscular civilization. The State of New Hampshire during the American Revolution adopted as its slogan, "Live free or die." It did not adopt as its slogan, "Live free or whine." So we have to take a very strong position.

I think that there are five parallel changes we have to make, and we badly need The Heritage Foundation's help, intellectually, in helping us understand how to make them because they have to occur simultaneously. All five have to be occurring in an interlocked synergistic pattern for it to work.

The first is the transition from a bureaucratic, mechanical, second wave society to an information age, third wave society. I'm using Alvin Toffler's model where he said the first wave was agriculture, the second wave was industry, the third wave is information. Very simple example: A good friend of mine, Chester Rausch, went from Carrollton, Georgia, to Rome, Italy, and put his bank teller card in the machine. It lit up on the screen in 11 languages; he touched English. It asked how much money he wanted; he put in the amount. It verified his account, validated his limit, and gave him the money in four seconds. Call the federal government and ask about a veteran's case.

Let me make something clear, though, because I think this is one of the places that we conservatives went wrong in the late '70s. This is not because government workers are stupid or lazy. This is because we have a management information structure in the government three generations behind the curve. And we need to rethink it not just in the government, but in this society. With distance learning, distance medicine, and distance work, we could liberate rural America in a way which would raise the quality of life, increase the take-home pay, and raise the range of choices for people in an explosion of new opportunities. And yet, the IRS is doing exactly the wrong thing. It is making it harder to have an office at home at a time when it should be making it easier to have an office at home. Now, that's an example of the scale of change.

The second major change we have to have is a thorough inventory of America to make sure that we are competitive in the world market. Let me make it very clear here. We are in the world market. You couldn't get out of the world market if you wanted to. We are permanently in the world market. The question is, are we going to win and become competitive and be successful in the world market? I would argue that we should have an inventory which reviews litigation, regulation, taxation, education, welfare, health, the structure of government—looks at all of it and says, "All right, how do we make sure?" Children in Georgia are not now being educated to compete with Florida and Alabama. They're being educated to compete with Germany, Japan, and China, and I would argue that that requires a minimum of two hours of homework a night if they're not going to be cheated of their capacity to compete.

Unlike liberals, that does not lead me to believe we now, therefore, have to have a federal department of homeworker checkers. What it leads to me to suggest to you is that we need to ask all parents to take seriously the education of their children. We need to ask them to see the teacher and ask for two hours of homework. We need for them to get a better teacher if the current teacher won't assign it. And, in the interim, we need for them to assign the homework because America historically has been a country where we get the job done; we don't find scapegoats for the failures.

I was taught how to read by my grandmother. General George Marshall was taught by his aunt. Historically, we had a team effort, and I want to come back to that in a minute, but I think we have to decide we're going to change whatever rules we have to change so that our children have the best jobs on the planet with the highest value added, with the best productivity, with the highest take-home pay, instead of the greatest range of choices of lifestyle. That's going to be our goal for every American.

The third thing we have to do is literally replace the welfare state with an opportunity society. I was a little surprised on Sunday and Monday because I was asked what should our focus be in dealing with the very poor. I believe we should have a conscious strategy of dramatically increasing private charities. I believe that private charities are more effective, are less expensive, and are better for the people they're helping.

I want to make the following case, and I'm prepared to fight this out in virtually any arena that we can arrange. There is an enormous moral burden, but not on those of us who would replace the welfare state. There is an enormous moral burden on those who would keep the poor trapped in public systems that are destroying them. The burden of destroying the poor is on the left. It is the left which traps the poor in public housing projects where no one goes to work. It is the left which traps the poor in public school buildings in the inner city where virtually no one educates. It is the left which keeps the poor in neighborhoods where they insist on putting violent criminals back on the street to prey upon the innocent. And it is the left which has designed a tax code and a welfare code which destroy families.

I'll give you two examples. If you earn $11,000 a year today and you marry somebody who earns $11,000 a year, by the act of marriage, at $22,000 joint income, you lose $4,600 in your earned income tax credit. Now do you wonder why children are born outside of marriage when the government punishes you by $4,600 out of a $22,000 joint income?

Now a second example. Bret Schundler, the brilliant mayor of Jersey City, who I believe is the leading practical reformer in America today, told me last night some astounding numbers. He said that there is a high school in Newark which graduates four percent of its entering class. The Newark schools currently spend $12,000 per student, which means that over the 13 years they're in school, you're currently paying $3,900,000 per graduate. What he did was simple. He said take the amount spent per child, take the number of years per child, and, if you're graduating four percent, figure out that's every 25th child. You take those numbers, and it comes out to—I know it's right mathematically; it just strikes me as being so nutty that it's hard to believe.

Well, if you went around America and said to the average poor family in America, "If you'll figure a way to get your kid to read, we'll give you $3 million," my guess is most of them would say, "I can find somebody in the family."

And again, you see all the pressures, because Mayor Schundler is prepared to put his career on the line to get a full experiment in vouchers, and he's getting resistance in the New Jersey Assembly from people who are frightened of the Teachers' Union and don't want to have a full experiment. I really hope that the New Jersey legislature will decide to give one courageous figure an opportunity to have a complete, full-blown experiment on his own terms. I would argue that when you learn that you're paying $1,700 per child in a Catholic elementary school where 96 percent learn how to read and write, and you're paying $9,200 per child in a school across the street where 26 percent are passing the minimum standard, maybe it's time we put the children first and found ways to get the children into places that work, rather than keep the children trapped so that public bureaucracies can keep taking the money whether they perform or not.

The fourth big change after moving into the information age, learning how to compete aggressively in the world market, and replacing the welfare state with an opportunity society is to reassert American exceptionalism. Let me make this quite clear. It's Everett Carl Ladd's term, a professor at the University of Connecticut; he's exactly right. I have been profoundly moved by the works of Professor Gordon Woods of Brown University on the American Revolution. His two great works, The Origins of the American Revolution and The Radicalism of the American Revolution, are worth your time. They're very serious works and for me at least, help me reestablish my understanding of what America was all about.

America exists. There is an American civilization. People come to America from all over the world to be American. If they wanted to be Somalian or Thai or German, they have countries they can stay in. They don't want to be. They want to become American. They want their children to have a scale of freedom, a scale of opportunity, a range of the right to pursue happiness unparalleled anywhere on the planet. And they're extraordinarily proud to become American. You see this in Elia Kazan's great work, America, America, and his description of the Armenians and how they felt when they saw a rusty merchant ship with an American flag. You see it again and again. You see it when you think about Colin Powell, a first-generation American whose parents had come here from the West Indies. You see it in John Shalikashvili, who himself emigrated to America at the age of eight or nine and is a graduate of Bradley University.

It is a remarkable thing to be American, and yet the phrase "to be American" implies that there is a set of characteristics that are American. I believe there are. I believe that we are a multiethnic society but one civilization. Our friends on the left believe that we are multicult-tural. I'm told there was a TV show (I didn't see it) which describes a public high school in Berkeley, California, which now organizes groups as tribes. I believe that is explicitly destructive of American civilization. I believe every individual in America has the right to be considered as an individual: not as part of a tribe or a group, but as an individual.

One of my suggestions for the near future is that we look seriously from Head Start through college at teaching the Declaration of Independence, and I want to cite one sentence because it's so powerful. In a document written, you'll remember, by Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson, it says, "We are endowed by our Creator with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I think there are three things to learn just from that one sentence, and I'd love to see every child wrestle with this once a year just as a part of learning about America. First of all, the pursuit of happiness implies active engagement. Pursuit comes from an active verb, to pursue. It doesn't suggest pursuit stamps, a Department of Happiness, or happiness therapy; nor does it guarantee final result. It doesn't say the achievement of happiness; it says the pursuit. And, of course, it was intimately bound up in freedom and private property because in the original wording, it was the right to possess, the pursuit of possession of property, not the pursuit of happiness.

Second, rights are unalienable. This is the most radical assertion of human rights ever in history. Your power doesn't come from lawyers or academics. Your power doesn't come from the government. That's why the Clinton health plan was exactly backwards. The right to choose your doctor in America is unalienable. The right for you to have power is unalienable. You loan power to the government; the government does not loan power to you. That's the core.

And, finally, in what in the modern era has become the most controversial part of this speech, it actually suggests your rights come not from a committee. I always thought that if the counterculture were trying to write this today, it would read, "Being randomly gathered protoplasm, we have rationally concluded that for the moment, the situation implies that the following temporary rights might be there—subject to further dialogue later."

Those things government should do, it should do brilliantly. It should be the best on the planet. But they should be very few things. I never got this until Gordon Woods explained it and really said to me, "Study Jefferson." His point was this: Jefferson knew that in a free society, rebuilding and renewing and strengthening your culture and society was absolutely vital because it underpinned everything else. Teaching and practicing and organizing things to ensure civic responsibility was vital because it liberated scales of energy nobody else could get. And creating free markets, entrepreneurship, private property, and the right to pursue happiness was central because it would liberate energy on a scale that no other society had ever seen. Therefore, you had to keep government limited because otherwise it would crowd out the other three functions.

So when you come to a problem or an opportunity, you should first ask, "Gee, what's the cultural and society answer," and then ask, "What does civic responsibility have to do," and then ask, "What do we do in the private sector?" And only at the end say, "Now, what's the limited part of the assignment that goes to government?"

When I opposed midnight basketball this summer, it wasn't because I'm opposed to midnight basketball. If your church or your synagogue, if your YMCA or YWCA, if your Boy Scouts or your Girl Scouts, if your local community, if your private business—if you think it is helpful to minimize crime in the summertime to have young people playing midnight basketball, that's fine. But the idea that we have to establish a federal bureaucracy to hire full-time bureaucrats to encourage children to stay out—that struck me as nutty.

Let me make just two quick last points. I appreciate you letting me talk this long, and I apologize for making it so elaborate, but I do think this is central to where we're going. Leadership, having thought through where it's going with vision and strategies and projects and tactics, having applied the model I've described for you today, then has to turn to the American people and listen, learn, help, and lead. We have to go into every poor neighborhood in America and say, "If we're going to replace the disaster you're currently trapped in with a world you want your children to live in, what would it look like?" And we have to work with every poor person who's willing to work with us. We have to go into every community.

Next week, when Bob Dole and I go down to the Republican Governors meeting in Williamsburg (which, by the way, is somewhat larger now than people thought it would be), we're going to discuss the range of opportunities that are out there. Because we want to say to the governors in this very same model, which I'm going to be sharing with them, "Tell us how much you're prepared to take back and we'll send it."

So we need to go back out not just to preach and to talk, but to say, "If you're willing to go in the same direction of renewing America as we are, let us listen to you. Tell us your worries, your fears, your concerns, your practical knowledge of your neighborhood and your life and what it's going to take to make this work." This is not going to happen overnight. We're not going to cut a Gordian knot, because we're talking about human beings and we're not going to cut human beings. This is exactly like the invention of the New Deal where Franklin Roosevelt and his team experimented and experimented and experimented. The difference is where they were acquiring power for Washington, we're giving power out back home; but it's the same process of experimentation.

Finally, let me suggest to you—and I say this because it's important to understand how we have mismanaged government in Washington—the role of the leader in a free society is, first, to set an agenda and communicate goals and standards. It is, second, to convey symbolic power. Why am I at The Heritage Foundation? Because this is an important center of ideas in America and I want to come here as the next Speaker and say I am glad you're participating and I'm glad you're involved. I did not go to some left-wing group that thought raising taxes and building bureaucracies work. They didn't invite me; but if they had, I wouldn't have gone.

Third, it's important to gather resources outside the government—and this is again, by the way, an example of the great failure of conservatism. When the press corps found the problem of the homeless, if we had said in the summer of 1981, "Let's invite every church and synagogue in America to send a representative to a national meeting. Now let's challenge every church and synagogue in America to adopt one homeless person for six months. Now let's have a second meeting and have you tell us what you've learned by trying to actually help these people," we would, by the summer of 1992, have had a radically better understanding of the problem without a single new government bureaucracy and would have been moving dramatically towards solving a problem which to this day, despite billions of tax-paid expenditures, continues to be a problem that should shame every American. That's a very different model of behavior than saying, "I found a problem. Let's invent a bureaucracy."

If we are merely a political victory, if this is just the liberal old gang being replaced by the new conservative gang, then we have truly failed our country. I believe with all of my heart that we are now launched on a great journey, that we are truly going to reach out in this city to every poor person of every background, that the poorest child in America in the worst neighborhood, whether they're on an American Indian reservation where they have been trapped and where their lives often end in alcoholism and suicide, or they're a poor child in East L.A. or Atlanta or here in Washington, D.C., and they may be into drug addiction and prostitution and violence and have no sense of hope, that the work that is ahead of every person in this room is to decide that civic responsibility and renewing American civilization is about us.

I don't know how to do this. No person knows how to do this. This is one of those great historic moments when we have to reach out with big hearts and with a willingness to listen to everybody and a willingness to make mistakes and get up off the ground and come back and try again and a willingness to reach out to any group of any background, liberal, conservative, Democrat, Republican—anybody who's willing to say, "Hey, helping this country be healthy and safe again really matters."

But I'll give you the yardstick for you to judge it against. If we have a Monday morning in the not too distant future, maybe by the year 2000, where you wake up and you turn on the morning news and not a single American child has been killed in the entire weekend, and you look out of your door and you see children going happily to a building where they actually learn, and you know that in your town, people who want to get off of welfare and out of poverty have found it surprisingly easy to open their small business and that they actually have a tax code and a regulatory code that is encouraging them to be productive, and you know that the last drug dealer was driven from America three months earlier and we haven't seen one since, and you know you have representatives who pay attention and there are town hall meetings regularly and that when you want to know what's going on in the Congress, you turn on C-SPAN and when a brand new bill is introduced, you just call it up on your home computer because it's as available to you at the same second as to the richest, best Washington lobbyist—when those things have happened, then we can say this revolution has succeeded. And that future, it seems to me, is worth every one of us giving of our money, of our life, of our courage, or to quote the Founding Fathers, that is worth our lives and our fortune and our sacred honor.

Thank you, good luck, and God bless you.
